

I asked you to my home,

For war hath no word of a fouler deed
Than the murder of David Creigh.

Pearl Buck Ancestral Home 100 Years Old

By SHIRLEY DONNELLY

Back there in November when I had a spell of writing about Pocahontas County and places up there, mention was made of Pearl Buck, the noted writer. This got a rise out of E. E. Ellison, Route 1, Box 61, Ronceverte. He wrote as follows:

"I notice in one of your articles in the Beckley Post-Herald that you made mention of Pearl Buck. My wife and I own and live at what is generally known as 'the old Sydenstricker home place', three miles west of Ronceverte, on Route 63. Pearl Buck's father was born in the house we live in. The great-grandfather of Pearl Buck was David Sydenstricker. He was the first Sydenstricker who was owner of this farm. According to the best I can find out Pearl Buck's grandfather's name was Absalom. Also Pearl's father was Absalom Jr. Here on this farm, great-grandfather David Sydenstricker lies buried. According to the headstone at his grave, he died in the month of March, 1948. Pearl Buck's father had six brothers and two sisters. I am sure Pearl visited this home many times in her younger days because in some of her writings she referred to it in a not very complimentary manner. This dwelling house was built more than 100 years ago, that is, the first portion of it was. Other rooms were added as the family grew larger. I have it on good authority that five of the Sydenstricker boys were ministers. Four of them were Presbyterians and one was a Methodist."

Well, that is a good letter indeed and one that is chock full of local history. Invited to call at their home if and when I get in their neck of the woods, the Ellisons can be sure they are going to have columnist company.

SAYING THAT the great-grandfather of Pearl Buck was David Sydenstricker, brings up the question of how many readers today, if any, can tell the names of their great-grandfathers.

One of the most interesting latter day hobbies is that of tracing back one's ancestry. Such are referred to often as "head hunters"—people looking for the heads of the families from which they have descended. Some times it proves embarrassing, as witness the case of the newly rich man who got someone to trace down his family history and found out his great grandmother was an old maid! Tracing back the lineage of the first families of California is said to be very revealing!

WHILE MIND IS up Greenbrier County way today, attention has been drawn to Old Greenbrier Church where those people called Baptists no longer have the pulpit in the center of the speaker's rostrum.

Someone with a flair for inquiry has asked the wherefore of this modern innovation in an old line Baptist meeting house. There in Old Greenbrier Church the pulpit is on one side of the rostrum and a lectern, or speaker's stand is on t'other. It was not ever thus. Question here dealt with today is why the pulpit is customarily in the center of the church rostrum and not why the Alderson congregation have a double-barrelled affair in their house of worship.

What is here said today is written analytically and not critically. Having the pulpit in the center of the rostrum and the Bible on it is the historical Protestant conception of what is the main thing in a service of worship. That pulpit in the center of the church with the Bible on it was the very spirit of the Reformation which was led by Martin Luther. Protestants hold that the Bible is the Word of God and is only the rule of faith and practice by which Christians are to live and mold their character. With them the sermon—the teaching of the word—is the main part of the service of worship. There in front of the pulpit is placed the Communion Table. It is the symbol of Christian fellowship.

WHEN THE REFORMATION, led by Luther, broke out in Europe, the Bible took the place of the altar. In a Baptist Church—and there is no such thing as "the" Baptist Church since it is only a Baptist denomination—there is no altar. And no mourner's bench, either.

It is in the Roman Catholic Church that one finds the altar as the thing of primary significance. This is true because that church teaches that the worship of its followers centers upon the Mass. They believe that the bread and the wine are actually transformed into the body and blood of the Lord. Since this view is held by them, Catholics believe the sacrifice of Christ is renewed each time at their Mass, through the power conferred upon the Catholic priest.

Here is one point on which Catholics and Protestants are clearly poles apart with no compromise whatever. The point being made is that with the Catholic the altar is central and with Protestants it is the Bible that is central. Crosses are seldom seen in a Baptist meeting house because these people hold the belief that the Bible, the central thing in their place of worship, contains all that the cross symbolizes. It is the historic position of Baptist churches that the commanding position of the pulpit places it in the center of the rostrum in the house of worship.

Again let it be stated, that today's offering is purely explanatory and not intended for argument—argument which tends to generate more heat than light!

WEST VIRGINIANS WHO HAVE MADE GOOD

Greenbrier-Born Pearl Buck

Best Known For 'Good Earth'

By WILLIAM E. MILLER
Feature Writer For The Daily Mail

West Virginia's best known novelist, Pearl Buck, was born June 26, 1892, the daughter of Abasiah and Caroline Stutting Sydeman in Hillsboro, Greenbrier county.

Her parents, who were Presbyterian missionaries, were spending a year in Europe and America. After a long period of hardship in the far interior of China, it happened that she was born in West Virginia, where her mother had spent her own childhood. Her father's business came to America before the Revolutionary War, and her mother's from Holland and Germany in quest of religious freedom.

Pearl Buck has just published her 17th novel, "Cry, the Beloved," her first story about India and a vivid novel about three American women in India.

Her early childhood found her back in China, at the city of Chongking, on the Yangtze river. Most of the time she lived in a small bungalow on the top of a hill where her mother had tried to escape the anxieties of the hostilities that prevailed there at that time. She learned to speak Chinese before English, but when it came time to read and write she studied English, rather than the difficult Chinese characters. Always a household highlight was the arrival of the yearly order from Montgomery Ward, and it was the privilege of each child to order an item not to exceed $10 for his own.

RETURN HOME
It wasn't until she was nine years old that the Sydeman family returned to America, and Pearl had a reunion at her birthplace with her husband, Edwin who was 21 years older and a college student. The family spent a year here and Pearl attended the third grade in Lexington, Va. During the winter following their return to China, Pearl began her first published writing. Her mother had asked her often to write down bits of stories, tiny poems, incidents, and helped her with her work of writing.

Her first story was published in the once-a-week children's page of the English newspaper, The Exchange Mercury. Several times she was one of the week's pickers, and today she recalls her old Chinese nurse, Wang Ahn, who she always knew more stories than any woman in the world, as having the best street literary talent she ever had. She attended the American Mission School for Chinese Girls, and during her 1 1/2 year work at the Anglo-American school in Kiating and decided to become a poet. With her prize money she had bought a lot of books and read and annotated them. At the age of 17 she was sent to Shanghai to prepare for an American college.

When the family and their year's leave to return to America, they came through Russia, Constantinople, Constantinople and England. Pearl attended women school in Massachusetts. They came to Hillsboro and then to Lynchburg, Va., where Edwin, his wife and daughter were living, and Pearl attended Franklin Mass. Women's college. Her work there was as busy as any American girl.

It was a busy experience. Her first job was at the home of where the girls learned to write and her first job as a nurse in a hospital. Her first job as a nurse in a hospital.

PEARL BUCK... Turns Out Her 17th Novel

four more children. She settled again into the routine of a busy life. Her father had retired and came to make his home with her. She began the study and translation of one of China's most famous novels, "The Child Who Never Grew," published three years ago. It was the experience with this child, when Carol was three months old, Pearl crossed her home and came to America to see medical specialists both for herself and her baby.

Pearl's second home was in Nanjing, a grey brick house in a beautiful garden, and she earned to Dovers and Ross. Her husband was teaching rural sanitation at the university. She surrounded herself with color and music, and today her favorite colors are still deep green, brilliant blue and jade green. She made the article's study, and after her mother's death on Oct. 28, 1921, she wrote a record of her life.

She kept busy writing, and in 1922 sent an article to the Atlantic Monthly, it was accepted, and published in the January, 1922, issue under the title, "In China, You." It was about the younger generation of Chinese. Her next piece, "Beauty in China," was published by the editor of Forum in March, 1921, and the Nation printed her article in "The Chinese Student Mind" in October that year.

BACK TO AMERICA
The time for another far-flung career and Pearl and John came to America in 1922. Pearl carried about their child, Pearl carried Cornell University in study for her sister's degree. When she reached America, her luggage contained the first section of her first novel, "East Wind, West Wind." It was first published in Asia magazine under the title, "A Chinese Woman Speaks." During her stay at Cornell she was the Laura Weaver prize in history.

Before her return to China she entered another daughter, Janice, who today is an occupational therapist. She has three other adopted daughters, and they tended to know her better.

EXCELLENT STUDENT
The professor of freshman English class found Pearl far surpassed the others in her preparation for work, and during her first year two of her stories were published in the school newspaper and the college annual. Her happiest days were spent in the library. She joined Kappa Delta sorority, was elected president of the Junior class and the Franklin Literary Society. Just busy tutoring high school students and was a conscientious instructor for a small number of years. After her graduation she went for three months in the psychology department of her alma mater, but returned to return to China to care for Carol, as she affectionately called her mother, who was ill.

She set herself to two tasks. The first was her care of Carol, the second, her study of the Chinese language.

When she returned to the country in 1933 she was greeted by a great wave of publicity. There was a dinner in her honor at the Waldorf Astoria with a brilliant guest list drawn from the New York literary world. When she came she was the star of every the most grand New York event. One of her long remembered pleasures of that year was her meeting with the late Will Rogers, and his first meeting he had said of "The Good Earth": "It is not only the greatest book about a people ever written but the best book of our generation."

Before the end of 1932, "Home" was published, and it was her first story, in the spring of 1932, a collection of short stories which she had written for many magazines was published and the American translation began nearly five years before appeared as "All Men Are Brothers." It stood at a momentous effort to disclose to the eyes of the English-speaking world the spirit of China.

WYU HONORED HER
In June, 1932, she called for Europe, the day was home to the Far East. She had learned to drive a car and was taking it to China with her. She turned consecutively in England, found Sweden to be like Ohio, Denmark pretty and life, Holland, that Italy beautiful and France enchanting. She sailed from July to India and in October arrived in Shanghai. She had her first meeting with Lin Yutang and encouraged him to write about his country, which resulted in the publication of his book "My Country and My People," for which she wrote an introduction.

She was back in America again June, 1934, and found that her last set book, "The Mother," published while she was in China, was selling well. When she arrived in America this time she had made up her mind to stay. She bought a home near Pocke, Pa., which was in the country, but she had

WYU HONORED HER
The book is a study of the Chinese people, and it was her first story about India and a vivid novel about three American women in India.

WYU HONORED HER
The book is a study of the Chinese people, and it was her first story about India and a vivid novel about three American women in India.

WYU HONORED HER
The book is a study of the Chinese people, and it was her first story about India and a vivid novel about three American women in India.

WYU HONORED HER
The book is a study of the Chinese people, and it was her first story about India and a vivid novel about three American women in India.

WYU HONORED HER
The book is a study of the Chinese people, and it was her first story about India and a vivid novel about three American women in India.

WYU HONORED HER
The book is a study of the Chinese people, and it was her first story about India and a vivid novel about three American women in India.

WYU HONORED HER
The book is a study of the Chinese people, and it was her first story about India and a vivid novel about three American women in India.

E. Dickson Speaks At Rotary Meeting

ROTHERY, Sept. 16.—Edg Dickson, former Clark County authority of West Virginia, gave a picture of the situation in portions of the Greenbrier Valley in assisting other Rotarians the weekly meeting.

Arth Edger was the guest of honor at the meeting, and a number of the ladies in and out of town were present. He stated that the situation in the Greenbrier Valley is not as bad as it once was. He stated that the situation in the Greenbrier Valley is not as bad as it once was.

Arth Edger had two sons who were killed in the American Army. Dickson's mother is now in West Virginia and he changed back.

Three different McClung families had related, were held at last in the Greenbrier Valley. Dickson, himself, is a member of a pioneer family and he is now in the Greenbrier Valley.

Three different McClung families had related, were held at last in the Greenbrier Valley. Dickson, himself, is a member of a pioneer family and he is now in the Greenbrier Valley.

Three different McClung families had related, were held at last in the Greenbrier Valley. Dickson, himself, is a member of a pioneer family and he is now in the Greenbrier Valley.

WEST VIRGINIANS WHO HAVE MADE Greenbrier-Born Pearl Best Known For 'Good'

By WILLIAM E. MILLER
Feature Writer For The Daily Mail

West Virginia's best known novelist, Pearl Buck, was born June 26, 1892, the daughter of Absalon and Caroline Stulting Sydenstricker in Hillsboro, Greenbrier county.

Her parents, who were Presbyterian missionaries, were spending a year in Europe and America, after a long period of hardships in the far interior of China. So it happened that she was born in West Virginia, where her mother had spent her own childhood. Her father's forebears came to America before the Revolutionary War, and her mother's from Holland and Germany in quest of religious freedom.

Pearl Buck has just published her 17th novel, "Cry, the Beloved," her first story about India and a vivid novel about three Americans' search for God.

Her early childhood found her back in China in the city of Chin-kiang, on the Yangtse river. Most of the time she lived in a small bungalow on the top of a hill where her mother had tried to escape the anxieties of the hostilities that prevailed in China at that time. She learned to speak Chinese before English, but when it came time to read and write she studied English rather than the difficult Chinese characters. Always a household highlight was the arrival of the yearly order from Montgomery - Ward, and it was the privilege of each child to order an item not to exceed $1 for his own.

RETURNS HOME

It wasn't until she was nine years old that the Sydenstrickers returned to America, and Pearl had a reunion at her birthplace with her brother, Edwin who was 11 years older and a college student. The family spent a year here and Pearl attended the third grade in Lexington, Va. During the winter following their return to China, Pearl began her first published writing. Her mother had asked her often to write down bits of her hearts, and they longed to know her better.

EXCELLENT STUDENT

The professor of freshman English soon found Pearl far surpassed the others in her preparation for work, and during her first year two of her stories were published in the school newspaper and the college annual. Her happiest days were spent in the library. She joined Kappa Delta sorority, was elected president of the Junior class and the Franklin Literary Society, kept busy tutoring high school students and was a convenient baby-sitter for a small nephew and niece. After her graduation she taught for three months in the psychology department at her alma mater, but resigned to return to China to care for Carie, as she affectionately called her mother, who was ill.

She set herself to two tasks. The first was her care of Carie, the second, her study of the Chinese language.

The month of May, 1917, Pearl was married to John Lossing Buck, a native of New York state, who was in China as a young specialist in agriculture. They went to live in Nankuchow, between Nanking and Peking, and her first contribution to the work at Nankuchow was to start a Sunday School. Part of the time they were the only white people in the town. In March, 1919, in Nanking, she had her first child, a daughter, who was destined never to be well. Her book, "The Child Who Never Grew," published three years ago, is the experience with this child. When Carol was three months old, Pearl closed her home and came to America to see medical specialists both for herself and her baby.

PEARL BUCK . . .

four more children. She set again into the routine of a busy life. Her father had retired and came to make his home with her. She began the study and translation of one of China's most famous novels, Shui Hu Chuan, a volume comprising over 100 pages when it was completed, telling the adventures of 108 major characters with an even larger number of minor ones.

Her early childhood found her back in China in the city of Chinkiang, on the Yangtse river. Most of the time she lived in a small bungalow on the top of a hill where her mother had tried to escape the anxieties of the hostilities that prevailed in China at that time. She learned to speak Chinese before English, but when it came time to read and write she studied English rather than the difficult Chinese characters. Always a household highlight was the arrival of the yearly order from Montgomery - Ward, and it was the privilege of each child to order an item not to exceed $1 for his own.

RETURNS HOME

It wasn't until she was nine years old that the Sydenstrickers returned to America, and Pearl had a reunion at her birthplace with her brother, Edwin who was 11 years older and a college student. The family spent a year here and Pearl attended the third grade in Lexington, Va. During the winter following their return to China, Pearl began her first published writing. Her mother had asked her often to write down bits of stories, tiny poems, incidents, and helped her with her ways of writing.

Her first story was published on the once-a-week children's page of the English newspaper, The Shanghai Mercury. Several times she won one of the week's prizes, and today she credits her old Chinese nurse, Wang Amah, who she claims knew more stories than any woman in the world, as having the first direct literary influence on her life. She attended the American Mission School for Chinese Girls, and during her 14th year went to the Anglo-American School in Kuling and decided to become a poet. With her prize money she had bought a set of books about modern authors, which she read and annotated copiously. At the age of 17 she was sent to Shanghai to prepare for an American college.

When the family took their year's leave to return to America, they came through Russia, Germany, France, Switzerland and England. Pearl attended summer school in Switzerland to learn French and German. They came to Hillsboro and then to Lynchburg, Va., where Edwin, his wife and daughter were living, and Pearl entered Randolph - Macon Woman's college. She was fascinated by so many American girls. It was a new experience. She did not know of the life of which the girls talked so much, and her life nephew and niece. After her graduation she taught for three months in the psychology department at her alma mater, but resigned to return to China to care for Carrie, as she affectionately called her mother, who was ill.

She set herself to two tasks. The first was her care of Carrie, the second, her study of the Chinese language.

The month of May, 1917, Pearl was married to John Lossing Buck, a native of New York state, who was in China as a young specialist in agriculture. They went to live in Nankuchow, between Nanking and Peking, and her first contribution to the work at Nankuchow was to start a Sunday School. Part of the time they were the only white people in the town. In March, 1919, in Nanking, she had her first child, a daughter, who was destined never to be well. Her book, "The Child Who Never Grew," published three years ago, is the experience with this child. When Carol was three months old, Pearl closed her home and came to America to see medical specialists both for herself and her baby.

Pearl's second home was in Nanking, a grey brick house in a rambling garden, and she turned to flowers and roses. Her husband was teaching rural economics at the university. She surrounded herself with color and bloom, and today her favorite colors are still deep apricot, brilliant blue and jade green. She made the attic into a study, and after her mother's death on Oct. 20, 1921, she wrote a record of her life.

She kept busy writing, and in 1922 sent an article to the Atlantic Monthly, it was accepted, and published in the January, 1923, issue under the title, "In China, Too." It was about the younger generation of Chinese. Her next piece, "Beauty in China," was published by the editor of Forum in March, 1924, and the Nation printed her article on "The Chinese Student Mind" in October that year.

BACK TO AMERICA

The time for another furlough came and Pearl and John came to America to consult a specialist about their child. Pearl entered Cornell university to study for her master's degree. When she reached America, her luggage contained the first section of the story later published as her first novel, "East Wind; West Wind." It was first published in Asia magazine under the title, "A Chinese Woman Speaks." During her stay at Cornell she won the Laura Messenger prize in history.

Before her return to China

four more children, again into the routine life. Her father had come to make his home. She began the study of one of Chiroux novels, Shui volume comprising pages when it was telling the adventurous characters with a number of minor

Her articles began more and more wide significance of China, nificances of the w teaching, too, in a university, and was ily on a manuscript she thought was to novel.

Because of her health she came to America in 1929, and a cable to China and back here. It was the acc first book. She went offices in New York title to one more acc publisher, and the 1 in May, 1930, after turned to Nanking. by critics and the s The same year she writing of her second sent it to New York

The next autumn nounced the manuscript accepted with great was named "The Good came a Book-of-the-M collection in March, 193 many of her books to this distinction, and seller for 21 months. year it won her the for Literature.

MORE BOOKS

Eighty-year-old Mr. er died at her home year his daughter w

PEARL BU

ONE

THE

grade in Lexington, Va. During the winter following their return to China, Pearl began her first published writing. Her mother had asked her often to write down bits of stories, tiny poems, incidents, and helped her with her ways of writing.

Her first story was published on the once-a-week children's page of the English newspaper, The Shanghai Mercury. Several times she won one of the week's prizes, and today she credits her old Chinese nurse, Wang Amah, who she claims knew more stories than any woman in the world, as having the first direct literary influence on her life. She attended the American Mission School for Chinese Girls, and during her 14th year went to the Anglo-American School in Kuling and decided to become a poet. With her prize money she had bought a set of books about modern authors, which she read and annotated copiously. At the age of 17 she was sent to Shanghai to prepare for an American college.

When the family took their year's leave to return to America, they came through Russia, Germany, France, Switzerland and England. Pearl attended summer school in Switzerland to learn French and German. They came to Hillsboro and then to Lynchburg, Va., where Edwin, his wife and daughter were living, and Pearl entered Randolph - Macon Woman's college. She was fascinated by so many American girls. It was a new experience. She did not know of the life of which the girls talked so much, and her life was as remote to them as though it had been on another planet. But she soon found a place in their

When Carol was three months old, Pearl closed her home and came to America to see medical specialists both for herself and her baby.

Pearl's second home was in Nanking, a grey brick house in a rambling garden, and she turned to flowers and roses. Her husband was teaching rural economics at the university. She surrounded herself with color and bloom, and today her favorite colors are still deep apricot, brilliant blue and jade green. She made the attic into a study, and after her mother's death on Oct. 20, 1921, she wrote a record of her life.

She kept busy writing, and in 1922 sent an article to the Atlantic Monthly, it was accepted, and published in the January, 1923, issue under the title, "In China, Too." It was about the younger generation of Chinese. Her next piece, "Beauty in China," was published by the editor of Forum in March, 1924, and the Nation printed her article on "The Chinese Student Mind" in October that year.

BACK TO AMERICA

The time for another furlough came and Pearl and John came to America to consult a specialist about their child. Pearl entered Cornell university to study for her master's degree. When she reached America, her luggage contained the first section of the story later published as her first novel, "East Wind; West Wind." It was first published in Asia magazine under the title, "A Chinese Woman Speaks." During her stay at Cornell she won the Laura Messenger prize in history.

Before her return to China she adopted another daughter, Janice, who today is an occupational therapist. Since then she has adopted pages when it telling the adv for characters er number of

Her articles more and mor significance of nificances of teaching, too, university, an of Nanking, ar ily on a ma she thought novel.

Because of health she can in 1929, and a to China and here. It was first book. Sh offices in New title to one m publisher, an in May, 1930, turned to Na by critics an The same y writing of h sent it to Ne

The next nounced the accepted with was named " came a Book lection in Ma many of her this distincti seller for 21 year it won for Literature

MORE BOOKS

Eighty-year er died at he year his dau the sequel to which she ha favorite amor China. The

"The Good Education, and Broadway.

or 'Good Earth'

That Nov
ells Med
five year
most dist
can ficti period. I
to Mary second t

In Jan
a memb
of Arts year to about h
"The G
as a m
Rainer
ving T was du gan to an Am Proud

WINS

On 1
Press
Swede
Litera
Pearl
The C dealin
Amer
ored.

Pea
prise
lous,
take.
the r
licly,
up S ish

She
holm was her born saile
is M

lives
Th

PEARL BUCK : . . Turns Out Her 17th Novel

four more children She settle
When she returned to this country in 1932 she was greeted by a

Chinese

7, Pearl
ng Buck, ate, who pecialist
to live
Nanking
contri-

suchow
ol. Part e only
vn. In he had r, who
ell. Her
Never
rs ago,
child.
hs old,
came pecial-
baby.
as in e in a turned sband ics at unded
t, and e still and attic

moth-
she ad in lantic
pub-issue too."' neraiece, ished
arch.
her
ident

ough
ame alist ered
r her
she page
the first nd."

PEARL BUCK : . . Turns Out Her 17th Novel

four more children. She settled again into the routine of a busy life. Her father had retired and came to make his home with her. She began the study and translation of one of China's most famous novels, Shui Hu Chuan, a volume comprising over 1200 pages when it was completed, and telling the adventures of 108 major characters with an even larger number of minor ones.

Her articles began to appear more and more widely, linking the significance of China with the significances of the world. She was teaching, too, in a Chinese state university, and in the University of Nanking, and was writing steadily on a manuscript, one which she thought was to be her first novel.

Because of her first child's health she came to America again in 1929, and a cable that had gone to China and back reached her here. It was the acceptance of her first book. She went to John Day's offices in New York, changed the title to one more acceptable to the publisher, and the book appeared in May, 1930, after Pearl had returned to Nanking. It was praised by critics and the sale was good. The same year she finished the writing of her second book, and sent it to New York.

The next autumn a cable announced the manuscript had been accepted with great enthusiasm. It was named "The Good Earth", became a Book-of-the-Month club selection in March, 1931, the first of many of her books to be accorded this distinction, and was a best seller for 21 months. The following year it won her the Pulitzer Prize for Literature.

When she returned to this country in 1932, she was greeted by a great wave of publicity. There was a dinner in her honor at the Waldorf-Astoria with a brilliant guest list drawn from the New York literary world. When she spoke she won the hearts of even the most cynical New York critics. One of her long remembered pleasures of that year was her meeting with the late Will Rogers. Long before this meeting he had said of "The Good Earth"; "It is not only the greatest book about a people ever written but the best book of our generation."

Before the end of 1932, "Sons" was published, and it too, became a best seller. In the spring of 1933, a collection of short stories which she had written for many magazines was published and the ambitious translation begun nearly five years before appeared as "All Men are Brothers." It stood as a monumental effort to disclose to the eyes of the English-speaking world the pageant of China.

VISITS BIRTHPLACE

In June she was awarded an honorary degree by Yale university, and returned to her alma mater in Lynchburg to speak at an alumnae dinner and to drive over Droop mountain to her old American home. She found her birthplace still noble in its proportions.

In June, 1933, she sailed for Europe, the long way home to the Far East. She had learned to drive a car and was taking it to China with her. She toured extensively in England, found Sweden to be like Ohio, Denmark pretty and tidy. Holland, flat, Italy beautiful and France enchanting. She sailed from Italy to India and in October ar-

up Stockholm and ish publisher confi
She knew she mu
holm to accept the
was worried about her sister's fourth
born the afternoon sailed. Her young is Mrs. J. B. Yi
lives in Washingto
The presentation
was a brilliant c

pets blared, cur
and Pearl was es
of honor by Dr.
secretary of the
When it came ti award, which s
few minutes of h
that the prize l
for all of her emphasis on bio
single book, whi deed. She wal
made her cur and received he containing a go

What made it
the fact that o
place on the p
walk backward
seemingly acre
rugs — and s seat! This w dinner at whic
crown Prince.
she delivered
Swedish Acade
and then a di
Palace. Before
was entertain
American Soci

WVU HONOR

"The Patriot
1939, and she dolph-Macon to Phi Beta Kap
celebration. L
the principal s
guration of a n
dolph-Macon. V sity presented orary degree
at the 1940 ex
cises. She too
in raising fund

and in Atlantic and published issue "Too." general piece, published March and her student to China and back reached her here. It was the acceptance of her first book. She went to John Day's offices in New York, changed the title to one more acceptable to the publisher, and the book appeared in May, 1930, after Pearl had returned to Nanking. It was praised by critics and the sale was good. The same year she finished the writing of her second book, and sent it to New York.

The next autumn a cable announced the manuscript had been accepted with great enthusiasm. It was named "The Good Earth", became a Book-of-the-Month club selection in March, 1931, the first of many of her books to be accorded this distinction, and was a best seller for 21 months. The following year it won her the Pulitzer Prize for Literature.

MORE BOOKS

Eighty-year-old Mr. Sydenstricker died at her home in 1931, the year his daughter wrote "Sons," the sequel to "The Good Earth," which she has often said is her favorite among her books about China. The Theater Guild chose "The Good Earth" for a dramatization, and it was produced on Broadway.

mental effort to disclose to the eyes of the English-speaking world the pageant of China.

VISITS BIRTHPLACE

In June she was awarded an honorary degree by Yale university, and returned to her alma mater in Lynchburg to speak at an alumnae dinner and to drive over Droop mountain to her old American home. She found her birthplace still noble in its proportions.

In June, 1933, she sailed for Europe, the long way home to the Far East. She had learned to drive a car and was taking it to China with her. She toured extensively in England, found Sweden to be like Ohio, Denmark pretty and tidy. Holland, flat, Italy beautiful and France enchanting. She sailed from Italy to India and in October arrived in Shanghai. She had her first meeting with Lin Yutang and encouraged him to write about his country, which resulted in the publication of his book, "My Country And My People," for which she wrote an introduction.

She was back in America again June, 1934, and found that her latest book, "The Mother," published while she was in China, was selling well. When she arrived in America this time she had made up her mind to stay. She built a home near Perkasio, Pa., which was in the country, for she has no love for a city. Many times in her childhood days she had felt seat! dinner crown she de Swedis and th Palace was e Ameri

WVU

"Th 1939, dolph Phi E celebr the p gurat dolph sity orary at th cises. in ra refug effort progr nized and ment decor White borde Howa 1942.

Her terrup hours her f allen in China and was very conscious of being an American.

The following June 11 she was married for a second time to Richard J. Walsh, a native of Kansas, president of the John Day Publishing Co., - 1 editor of Asia magazine. He was the man who had accepted her first book because it was so beautifully written and because it showed such promise. That November she won the Howells Medal, given only once in five years in recognition of the most distinguished work of American fiction published during that period. It has been awarded first to Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, and second to Willa Cather.

In January, 1936, she was elected a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, and in that year too, "The Exile," the book about her mother, was published. "The Good Earth" was produced as a movie in 1937, starring Luise Rainer, and the picture was Irving Thalberg's last production. It was during this year that she began to write her first novel with an American setting, titled, "This Proud Heart."

WINS NOBEL PRIZE

On Nov. 10, 1938, the Associated Press reported from Stockholm, Sweden, "The 1938 Nobel Prize for Literature today was awarded to Pearl Buck, American author of The Good Earth and other novels dealing with China. She is the first American woman to be so honored."

Pearl, taken completely by surprise said at once, "That's ridiculous, the report must be a mistake." She actually did not believe the news, or comment on it publicly, until her husband had called up Stockholm and had her Swedish publisher confirm it.

She knew she must go to Stockholm to accept the award but she rich yellow rose has been given her name.

She has a hobby of sculpturing enjoys cooking, and always cooks the Sunday dinner in her household as well as the Christmas dinner. Another of her recent hobbies is the establishment of "Welcome Home," a child welfare organization offering family home care to Asian-American children, which she began in December, 1948. Two Welcome Homes have been established one in Dublin, Pa., another in Lansdale, Pa.

In these homes, children live in a warm family atmosphere, and it is intended that care for these children will continue until they are of age, and will include a college education when it is found to be warranted. Many have been placed in adoptive homes. Known to all the children as "Gran," she keeps a helpful, guiding hand on all the activities of the homes which she helped to organize and maintain along with her neighbors in Bucks county.

Pearl Buck is not a Chinese woman as so many people think. She is a West Virginian of whom we are extremely proud. Few modern writers have done so much to further the common understanding of the human heart.

E. Dickson Speaks At Rotary Meeting

RONCEVERTE, Sept. 14—E. Dickson, Second Creek farmer and authority of local history, presented a picture of the situation in the portion of the Greenbrier Valley in entertaining fellow Rotarians at the weekly meeting.

was during this year that she began to write her first novel with an American setting, titled, "This Proud Heart."

WINS NOBEL PRIZE

On Nov. 10, 1938, the Associated Press reported from Stockholm, Sweden, "The 1938 Nobel Prize for Literature today was awarded to Pearl Buck, American author of The Good Earth and other novels dealing with China. She is the first American woman to be so honored."

Pearl, taken completely by surprise said at once, "That's ridiculous, the report must be a mistake." She actually did not believe the news, or comment on it publicly, until her husband had called up Stockholm and had her Swedish publisher confirm it.

She knew she must go to Stockholm to accept the award, but she was worried about the arrival of her sister's fourth child. It was born the afternoon before Pearl sailed. Her younger sister, Grace, is Mrs. J. B. Yankey, and now lives in Washington, D. C.

The presentation on Dec. 10, 1938, was a brilliant ceremony. Trumpets blared, curtains were drawn and Pearl was escorted to her place of honor by Dr. Per Halstrom, the secretary of the Swedish Academy. When it came time to receive the award, which seems the longest few minutes of her life, she learned that the prize had been awarded for all of her work with special emphasis on biographies, not for a single book, which delighted her indeed. She walked to the king, made her curtsy, shook hands, and received her citation and a box containing a gold medal.

What made it all so difficult was the fact that on the return to her place on the platform she had to walk backwards over what was along with her neighbors in Bucks county.

Pearl Buck is not a Chinese woman as so many people think. She is a West Virginian of whom we are extremely proud. Few modern writers have done so much to further the common understanding of the human heart.

E. Dickson Speaks At Rotary Meeting

RONCEVERTE, Sept. 14—Edgar Dickson, Second Creek farmer and authority of local history, presented a picture of the situation in the portion of the Greenbrier Valley in entertaining fellow Rotarians at the weekly meeting.

Arch Edgar was 50 years old a century ago, Dickson said, and was owner of the lands in and about Ronceverte. He operated a mill about where the home of R. Austin now stands. He called the "St. Lawrence Estate," and the St. Lawrence Ford was at the riffle back of Honaker's Store.

Arch Edgar had two sons who later served in the Confederate Army. Dick Prry's mother was an Edgar descendant and the property in West Ronceverte had not changed hands.

A century ago there were nine grist mills and two woolen mills on Second Creek. The present Nickell's Mill was a center of activities. Some other prominent families around Ronceverte 100 years ago were Manns, Persinger Erwins, Johnsons, Massies and Levels.

Pearl Buck's grandfather lived once in the E. E. Ellison home at Ronceverte, Dickson said.

Branching out from Ronceverte and going back even further the lives in Washington, D. C.

The presentation on Dec. 10, 1938, was a brilliant ceremony. Trumpets blared, curtains were drawn and Pearl was escorted to her place of honor by Dr. Per Halstrom, the secretary of the Swedish Academy. When it came time to receive the award, which seems the longest few minutes of her life, she learned that the prize had been awarded for all of her work with special emphasis on biographies, not for a single book, which delighted her indeed. She walked to the king, made her curtsy, shook hands, and received her citation and a box containing a gold medal.

What made it all so difficult was the fact that on the return to her place on the platform she had to walk backwards over what was seemingly acres of deep Oriental rugs — and she didn't miss her seat! This was followed by a dinner at which her host was the crown Prince. The next morning she delivered a speech at the Swedish Academy, attended a tea and then a dinner at the King's Palace. Before she left Sweden she was entertained by the Swedish-American Society.

WVU HONORED HER

"The Patriot" was published in 1939, and she was again at Randolph-Macon to join old friends and Phi Beta Kappas at their annual celebration. Last year she was the principal speaker at the inauguration of a new president at Randolph-Macon. West Virginia university presented her with the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters at the 1940 commencement exercises. She took active leadership

Austin now stands. He called the "St. Lawrence Estate," and the St. Lawrence Ford was at the raffle back of Honaker's Store.

Arch Edgar had two sons who later served in the Confederate Army. Dick Perry's mother was an Edgar descendant and the property in West Ronceverte had not changed hands.

A century ago there were nine grist mills and two woolen mills on Second Creek. The present Nickell's Mill was a center of activities. Some other prominent families around Ronceverte 100 years ago were Manns, Persinger, Erwins, Johnsons, Massies and Levels.

Pearl Buck's grandfather lived once in the E. E. Ellison home at Ronceverte, Dickson said.

Branching out from Ronceverte and going back even further than a century, Dickson found that a man named McClanahan once owned the land where Lewisburg now stands and the same family owned much of the land now in Roanoke, Va. McClanahan was killed in the Battle of Point Pleasant.

Three different McClung families, not related, were early settlers in the Greenbrier Valley, he said.

Dickson, himself, is a member of a pioneer family and he resides on and farms land that has been owned from pioneer days by the Dickson family.

... and she
at! This was followed by a anner at which her host was the own Prince. The next morning e delivered a speech at the vedish Academy, attended a tea d then a dinner at the King's alace. Before she left Sweden she as entertained by the Swedishmerican Society.

VU HONORED HER

"The Patriot" was published in 1939, and she was again at Randolph-Macon to join old friends and Phi Beta Kappas at their annual celebration. Last year she was the principal speaker at the inauguration of a new president at Randolph-Macon. West Virginia university presented her with the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters at the 1940 commencement exercises. She took active leadership in raising funds for help of Chinese refugees and gave her name and effort to the United China Relief program. For this she was recognized by Madame Chiang Kai-shek, and in 1941 the Chinese government conferred upon her a high decoration, The Order of Jade, White Cravat with Red and Blue borders. St. Lawrence University and Howard University honored her in 1942.

Her writing has continued uninterrupted. She spends the morning hours at her typewriter. She loves her flowers, and in her honor a owned the land where Lewisburg now stands and the same family owned much of the land now in Roanoke, Va. McClanahan was killed in the Battle of Point Pleasant.

Three different McClung families, not related, were early settlers in the Greenbrier Valley he said.

Dickson, himself, is a member of a pioneer family and he resides on and farms land that has been owned from pioneer days by the Dickson family.

West Virginia's Pearl Buck Can't Purchase Ancestral Home

BY HAROLD LAMBERT
(Division of Education—Conservation Commission)

HILLSBORO — A 96-year-old frame house located on "Main Street" here is the birthplace of West Virginia's most distinguished novelist.

The Stulting homestead, now the John Edgar house, was the setting for Pearl Buck's birth in 1892. At the time, her parents were on furlough from missionary service in China.

The house stands in perfect repair today, the home of the Edgars, prosperous Pocahontas county farmers and stockmen who make their living from the 1100-acre "plantation". Broad level fields produce magnificent West Virginia grain, and the pastures are ideal for sheep and cattle. "It's a fine farm," John Edgar says with pride. "One of the best. . ."

West Virginia's gift to modern-day literature was the daughter of Absalom and Caroline Sydenstricker, transplanted Pocahontas Countians who saw their mission in life in bringing Christianity to the heathen of the orient. As an infant, Pearl was taken back to China where she spent her girlhood years. "Her childhood was spent listening to her mother relate tales of her own girlhood in the beautiful hills of West Virginia," says one biographer.

The 12-room house, a colonial type structure of West Virginia workmanship, inspired Pearl Buck to say of its construction, "The wood they took from their own lands and each of the labor as they could and supply themselves they exchanged." She had reference to her Holland-born forebears who first settled here in Hillsboro. The Dutch were from the Netherlands and they built a sturdy house, stone houses nearby have not done nearly as well with the years. Inside the house beautiful walnut paneling is still greatly displayed by John Edgar, who has filled the bookshelves with his own volumes—mostly the Southern type literature that is so popular in the section of the state. A full set of "The BIRTHPLACE of Pearl Buck, internationally known author of "The Good Earth" and other best selling novels, is this house now owned by John Edgar, Hillsboro. Located in the wide lush farming section of the Greenbrier Valley, this homeplace is a part of an 1,100-acre plantation which is actively and successfully farmed today. Pearl Buck revisited the scene four years ago with an idea toward buying the farmstead—but was told that the Edgar's planned to keep it as their own. The house was built in 1838.

(Conservation Commission Photo)

PEARL BUCK IN LEWISBURG

Pearl Sydenstricker Buck, noted author, and her husband, H. J. Walsh, a prominent New York publisher, were visitors in Lewisburg Tuesday.

The present Mrs. Walsh, who first

The house stands in perfect repair today, the home of the Edgars, prosperous Pocahontas county farmers and stockmen who make their living from the 1100-acre 'plantation'. Broad level fields produce magnificent West Virginia grain, and the pastures are ideal for sheep and cattle. "It's a fine farm," John Edgar says with pride. "One of the best. . ."

West Virginia's gift to modern-day literature was the daughter of Absalom and Caroline Sydenstricker, transplanted Pocahontas Countians who saw their mission in life in bringing Christianity to the heathen of the orient. As an infant, Pearl was taken back to China where she spent her girlhood years. "Her childhood was spent listening to her mother relate tales of her own girlhood in the beautiful hills of West Virginia," says one biographer.

The 12-room house, a colonial type structure of West Virginia hardwoods, inspired Pearl Buck to say of its construction, "the wood they took from their own lands and such of the labor as they could not supply themselves they exchanged." She had reference to her Holland-born forebears who first settled here in Hillsboro. The Stultings were frugal folks and they built a sturdy house; stone houses nearby have not done nearly so well with the years. Inside the house beautiful walnut paneling is still proudly displayed by John Edgar, who has filled the bookshelves with his own volumes—mostly the Southern type literature that is so popular in this section of the state. A full set of "Lee's Lieutenants" and other Confederate lore is prominently displayed in the ancient bookcase.

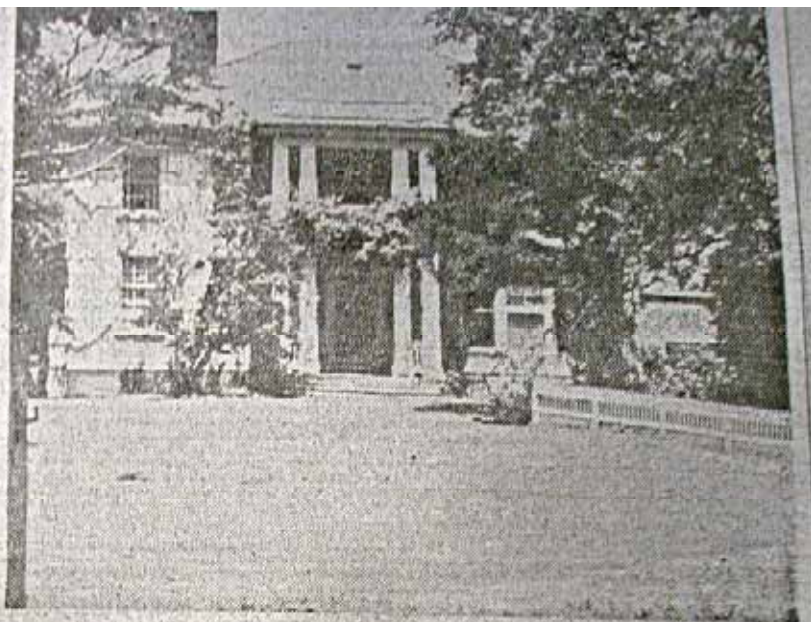

"The Yankees just about ruined us at one time," John Edgar says. "We had to rebuild everything."

However, the house remained intact. Today it is brightly painted and in splendid condition.

Pearl Buck remained in China with her missionary parents until she was 17. Then she was sent back to attend Randolph-Macon College (now without) in Lynchburg, where she was president of her class. In 1914 she received her Bachelor of Arts Degree. Later she was in school Cornell University (1920), Yale University, and the University of West Virginia.

Miss Buck (Sydenstricker) had her first literary works published in the Shanghai Mercury, and English language newspaper when she was 17. Later she taught at the University of Hankow and Cheng King University.

BIRTHPLACE of Pearl Buck, internationally known author of "The Good Earth" and other best selling novels, is this house now owned by John Edgar, Hillsboro. Located in the wide lush farming section of the Greenbrier Valley, this homeplace is a part of an 1,100-acre plantation which is actively and successfully farmed today, Pearl Buck revisited the scene four years ago with an idea toward buying the farmstead—but was told that the Edgar's planned to keep it as their own. The house was built in 1858.

(Conservation Commission Photo)

PEARL BUCK IN LEWISBURG

Pearl Sydenstricker Buck, noted authoress, and her husband, R. J. Walsh, a prominent New York publisher, were visitors in Lewisburg Tuesday.

The present Mrs. Walsh, who first became famous with her best-selling book "The Good Earth," drove up to the county library in Lewisburg in a large automobile with a chauffeur, and with her husband went into the library. She didn't reveal her identity but asked a number of questions about the county and Lewisburg—and signed the register, "Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Walsh."

She was born in Hillsboro, her father being a Methodist minister at that time and later a missionary to China, where Mrs. Walsh found a fertile field for her literary talents.

Her marriage to Mr. Walsh is her second.

Catalpas Blooming

As this is written the catalpa trees at Upper Downs are blooming in all their glory. Some people don't like catalpa trees. That is easy to understand because there shelves with his own volumes—mostly the Southern type literature that is so popular in this section of the state. A full set of "Lee's Lieutenants" and other Confederate lore is prominently displayed in the ancient bookcase.

"The Yankees just about ruined us at one time," John Edgar says. "We had to rebuild everything."

However, the house remained intact. Today it is brightly painted and in splendid condition.

Pearl Buck remained in China with her missionary parents until she was 17. Then she was sent back to attend Randolph-Macon College (for women) in Lynchburg, where she was president of her class. In 1914 she received her Bachelor of Arts Degree. Later she was to attend Cornell University (1926), Yale University, and the University of West Virginia.

Miss Buck (Sydenstricker) had her first literary works published

* * * *

in the Shanghai Mercury, and English language newspaper when she was 17. Later she taught at the University of Nanking and Chang Yang University.

In 1925, Pearl Buck's "A Chinese Woman Speaks" appeared in the magazine Asia. From then on her literary career was established. She won the Pulitzer prize for literature in 1933 for "The Good Earth." And in 1938 she was the first woman ever to receive the Nobel Award for Literature. Her life in China has been replete with adventure and excitement (once she escaped capture by bandits by only a few hours).

* * * *

Four years ago Pearl Buck revisited Pochahontas County with her six children, four of whom are adopted. At that time she asked about purchasing the old Stulting homestead, but was told that the Edgar's planned to keep it as their own.

"She is a wonderful woman," John Edgar says.

visitors in Lewisburg Tuesday.

The present Mrs. Walsh, who first became famous with her best-selling book "The Good Earth," drove up to the county library in Lewisburg in a large automobile with a chauffeur, and with her husband went into the library. She didn't reveal her identity but asked a number of questions about the county and Lewisburg—and signed the register, "Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Walsh."

She was born in Hillsboro, her father being a Methodist minister at that time and later a missionary to China, where Mrs. Walsh found a fertile field for her literary talents.

Her marriage to Mr. Walsh is her second.

Catalpas Blooming

As this is written the catalpa trees at Upson Downs are blooming in all their glory. Some people don't like catalpa trees. That is easy to understand because there are some people who ought to be in the asylum, as they used to say. Perhaps some of my older readers, if any, can remember the long, spikey growths that the catalpa tree produces a little later on. It was long ago told me that these were formerly called "Indian stogies." Word had it that when the Indians were short on tobacco they would gather these long tickies off the catalpa tree and dry them. After they were dried the Indian smoked them in place of smoking the weed, hence the designation of "Indian stogies."

At least we heard it out there in the country where I grewed. Old folks used to describe a cigarette as "A fire at one end and a fool at the other."